

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.

Sub-Saharan Africa remains the region most heavily affected by HIV, while its population is the least-equipped to fight the pandemic. Anti-retroviral drugs can cost up to $800 per person per year, while millions of those infected live in poverty, living on less than $2 per day -- less than the price of a cup of coffee in the United States.